It's refreshing when a winning candidate acts quickly on the promises they made while campaigning for office.

That's the case with new Attorney General Ashley Moody.

During the election season last year, Moody told the Times-Union Editorial Board that if elected, she would immediately tackle two important issues in Florida: our opioid epidemic and human trafficking.

She's been true to her promise.

During her first week in office, Moody announced the formation of the Opioid Abuse Working Group, chaired by Seminole County Sheriff Dennis Lemma.

The working group includes members from law enforcement, addiction treatment, government, nonprofits and the health sector.
